y Is What You Make It!

at you make it, says alvin, dairy scientist Polytechnic Institute, he adds, that many mers are not maky as they had test results have ny Virginians into al top quality hay is mands. For example, n expected that the ay could exceed 55 energy per 100 best sample tested ently from the 1962 ained only 45 therms gy, while most were therms.

pring the poorest hay st energy would additional two-thirds they might not be or one-fourth pound ch meal per 100 hay, to supply the ergy as cows consider better hay (45 this would not supply ease in protein. It as additional 4 onehe hay or one ton ns containing 18 per otein in addition to a ower hay (27 therms) to supply the same amount of protein that would be supplied by the one ton of the better hay without any concentrates.

About 1300 pounds of shelled corn would be needed with the good hay to supply the same amount of net energy as supplied by the ton of poor hay plus the ton of concentrates. This, in turn, would give 117 pounds more total protein than the poor hay and concentrate combination.

Reducing nutrient losses can be accomplished in many ways. A book titled, "Feeds and Feeding" gives several sources of loss:

Variety makes its contribution. For example, cutting grasses before the heading stage produces a hay which can be almost as good as alfalfa, although usually lower in protein.

Shattering in field - cured hay causes loss of at least 38 percent of leaves in good hay - making weather.

Fermentation loss amounts to sun and length of storage.

There is very little loss through leaching unless hay is thoroughly soaked and washed after the hay has been well-dried.

Even in good haying weather, hays may lose from 10 to 30 percent of their original dry matter in handling and storing.

The scientist says, "Always cut hay crops at their recommended stage according to variety. Store hay crops as hay during favorable seasons. Store them as silage when the odds for good hay-making weather are poor."

Abbitt Hopeful That Hearings Will Be Held On His Court Bill

Rep. Watkins M. Abbitt, D-Va., said last week he is hopeful that hearings will be held by the House Judiciary Committee on his proposal that federal courts be deprived of jurisdiction in civil actions to compel a state or locality to implement a court decision.

Abbitt said he had been informed by Chairman Emanuel Celler, D-N.Y., that Celler had referred the Abbitt bill to Judiciary Subcommittee No. 5, which has jurisdiction on such bills.

In reply to Celler's letter Abbitt urged that hearings be called as soon as possible "so that consideration can be given to this bill during this session."

"This is not a regional matter, but one which effects all of the 50 states. The decision in the Prince Edward case has shocked many people thoughout the nation. It has raised questions which deserve congressional attention."

Abbitt's letter further asserted, "We pride ourselves on being a nation of laws and not of men; a nation where constitutional government is butressed by separation of powers among the three branches of government; where local, state and national governments each perform functions which are respected by the others. Yet the decision in the Prince Edward case violates all that we thought was secure.

"If a federal court can order a local legislative body to levy taxes it presumably can set the tax rate, establish the collection policy and carry out the functions which the taxes are designated to finance.

"If this is true, then we no longer have a clear division between the federal government and the governments of the states and localities.

"If a court can force a local governmental body to legislate, then presumably it can force state legislatures — and even the Congress — to do the same."
